

Owen Probst of Midway is the proud owner of this handsome barn situated by itself on a hill. He is the original owner of this barn and said that some of the builders were Amos and Lawrence Wilson.

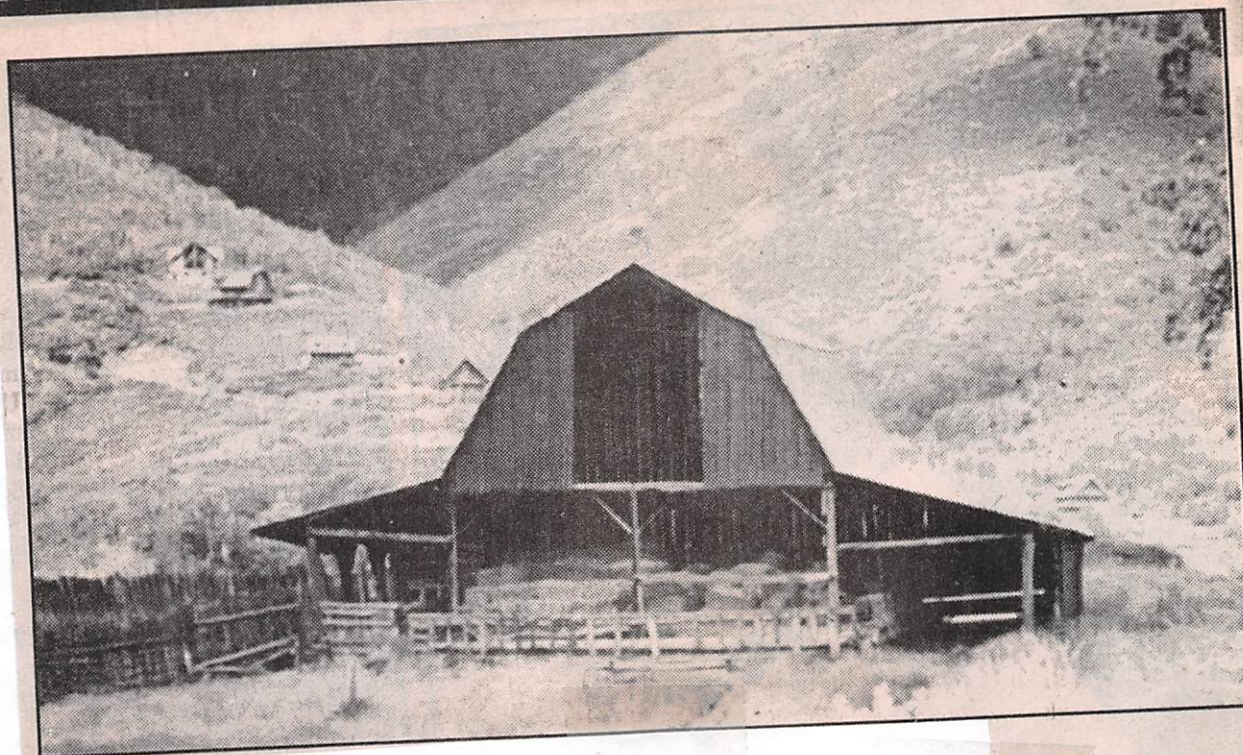

It is located at 101 West on Center Street and a great view of it can be had by going North on 1st East and looking East toward the mountains.

The barn was built of redwood and the roof built of metal. It was built to store hay for Hereford cattle, who were very lucky to have warm water from a spring.

Into Owen Probst

March 25, 1998

CATCH WAVE

Owen Probst Barn

Owen Probst, of Midway, is the proud owner of this handsome barn situated by itself on a hill. He is the original owner of this barn and said that some of the builders were Amos and Lawrence Wilson.

It is located at 101 West on Center Street and a great view of it can be had by going North on 1st East and looking east toward the mountains.

The barn was built of redwood and the roof built of metal. It was built to store hay for Hereford cattle, who were very lucky to have warm water from a spring.

Photographer and Researcher: Florine M Whiting

Owen Foster of Albany is the proud owner of this handsome place situated by Indian Creek. He is the original owner of this place and said that some of the builders were Amos and Lawrence Wilson.
It is located at 101 Western Center Street and a great view of it can be had by going north on 1st East and looking east toward the mountains.

The farm was built of redwood and the roof built of metal. It was built to store hay for Harwood cattle who were very lucky to have warm water from a spring.